

What is a Removal Order?

A removal order (formerly called a "deportation order") is issued when a U.S. court decides that a person is not legally allowed to stay in the United States. This can happen for different reasons, such as:

- Entering the U.S. without proper documents or a visa
- Overstaying a visa
- Committing certain crimes
- Violating immigration rules

Can a Removal Order Be Challenged?

Yes. In many cases, a person can:

- Appeal the decision to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA)
- Ask to reopen or reconsider the case
- Apply for relief from removal, such as asylum, withholding of removal, or other protections
- But strict deadlines apply — usually within 30 days of the decision.

What is a Final Removal Order?

A final removal order is the last step in the U.S. immigration removal (deportation) process — meaning that the person has been officially ordered to leave the United States, and no further appeals or legal actions are pending. Either:

- The person did not appeal the decision within the allowed time (usually 30 days), or
- The person appealed, but the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA) or federal court confirmed the removal decision. At this point, the order becomes final.

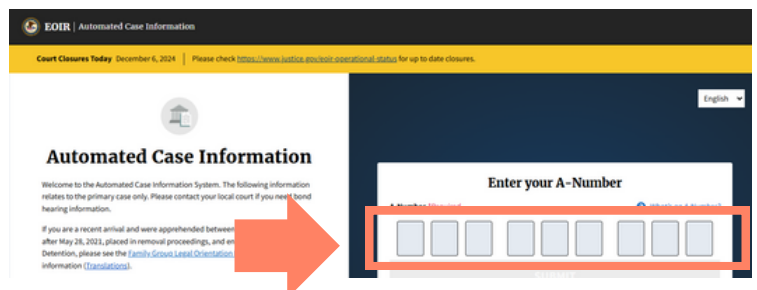

In this case, the person is required to leave the U.S. — either voluntarily (in some cases) or by forced removal by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

- If the person does not leave, they can be arrested and physically removed.
- A removal order also usually results in a ban from returning to the U.S. for a certain period — often 5, 10, or even 20 years.
